Armed forces pensions

The court deals with civil service pensions for members of the armed forces using exactly the same orders as any other pension (see our general article on pensions and divorce).

However, the process of obtaining all the information needed to prepare the case for the court in the first place is more complex and potentially time consuming than with most private pensions.

There are specific forms that need to be accurately completed and set time scales involved. If this is not done correctly there can be lengthy time delays in obtaining the information the court requires. And, of course, without the information, the court cannot decide upon the financial settlement and make a clean break.

Once the divorce process has begun it is usual to want it finished as soon as possible. To avoid any unnecessary delays contact one of our experienced solicitors who are well practiced in dealing with Armed Forces Pensions or visit www.gardandco.com.
